Are you ready for your ELL Program Investigation?

The federal government has launched numerous investigations into whether school districts are providing services to English Language Learner (ELL) students consistent with federal legal requirements. Education Week¹ reports that:

The Office for Civil Rights (OCR) is conducting compliance reviews of ELL programs in eight states which include California, Oregon, Washington, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut. Since President Obama took office in January 2009, the Department of Justice (DOJ) has investigated ELL programs in 15 school districts across the country, including districts in California, Colorado, and Massachusetts.

Russlynn Ali, Assistant Secretary of the OCR, commented that the "OCR and the DOJ will continue to work together to ensure that all ELL students across this country receive the educational services to which they are entitled under our laws."²

The self-audit form is intended for use by a school district to examine if the district has procedures in place to demonstrate compliance and accountability to federal and state regulations addressing the needs of ELLs.

The checklist is not intended to constitute legal advice. It may be useful for school district personnel to consult with an attorney who is experienced and knowledgeable about the requirements of the law so as to determine the school district's level of potential exposure.

Newsroom Updates

Minimize risks to your school district

Illinois Mandatory Moment of Silence Held to Be Constitutional

10/7/2010 - In October, the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals (Covering Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana) held the Illinois mandatory moment of silence law to be Constitutional because it served a secular purpose and did not otherwise advocate or inhibit the exercise of religion. Illinois school teachers are now required to have a moment of silence during the day. To read more, visit the SLRMA Newsroom.

Ohio Teachers have No First Amendment Rights in Selecting Materials and Methods.

10/27/2010 - In an unanimous decision, the Sixth Circuit Federal Court of Appeals (Covering Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee) held a teacher has no First Amendment right to use Heather Has Two Mommies as part of her Curriculum. Visit the SLRMA Newsroom for more on this recent development.

Notable Court Decisions:

School Districts' Compliance with Title IX Becomes the Subject of Greater Scrutiny

The National Women's Law Center has launched a national campaign against districts that have violated Title IX by filing complaints against 12 districts with the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights ("OCR"). Visit the SLRMA Newsroom to learn the three different ways in which a school district can comply with Title IX and avoid becoming a target of the OCR.

Districts' Federal Funding at Risk If Bullying and Harassment Policy are Not in Place.

With increased awareness of school bullying and the high-profile incidents of bullying and harassment leading to student suicides, the U.S. Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights ("OCR") notified school districts that they are potentially at risk of losing federal funding and possible lawsuits if the school districts do not take steps with respect to such bullying. The SLRMA Newsroom provides an outline of steps that a school district can take in response to such bullying incidents and what acts the OCR expects school districts will take to prevent such incidents in the future.
